

Pig Butchering Boss Explains Why Committing Fraud Overseas Is Ok

An essay posted on Telegram by A Chinese Scam Boss

Why advocate for overseas operations to boost the economy and oppose domestic operations? Chinese people do not harm other Chinese people.

From a purely profit and logical perspective, I advocate for overseas operations to boost the economy and oppose domestic operations because I firmly believe that “Chinese people do not cheat Chinese people.”

Overseas operations are a good way to make money. I value overseas operations because they allow us to earn big money. Targeting countries other than China for capital allocation offers many opportunities. Many countries have lax regulations and their technical means can’t catch these loopholes, I can easily make a large sum of money.

This money can eventually flow back to China, indirectly increasing our country’s wealth. I think this is a smart approach that allows me to get rich while also benefiting the domestic economy. Domestic operations only cause harm, so I oppose them because it is like stabbing our own people in the back. Scamming ordinary Chinese people means the money earned is taken directly from our compatriots’ pockets. This not only harms them but also disrupts social order at home. If everyone cheats each other, who can trust whom? When the economic environment is chaotic, my own business cannot be done properly.

Why advocate for overseas operations to boost the economy and oppose domestic operations? Chinese people do not harm other Chinese people.

From a purely profit and logical perspective, I advocate for overseas operations to boost the economy and oppose domestic operations because I firmly believe that "Chinese people do not cheat Chinese people."

Overseas operations are a good way to make money. I value overseas operations because they allow us to earn big money. Targeting countries other than China for capital allocation offers many opportunities. Many countries have lax regulations and their technical means

Not to mention the strict domestic regulations and police enforcement. If I dared to operate domestically, I would sooner or later get caught. So I absolutely avoid domestic operations. Chinese people do not harm other Chinese people — this is my bottom line. Low risk is the real deal.

Another reason I choose overseas operations is because the risk is low.

Foreign laws cannot reach me, and the chance of being caught is much smaller. Even if something goes wrong, it's not easy to deal with me. Domestic operations are different. I know China's law enforcement efficiency very well. One slip-up and I get caught, losing both my money and freedom.

I do this business to make money, not to send myself to jail. So overseas operations are a safer path for me.

Unity is strength.

I have always believed that we Chinese must unite. Overseas operations are like fighting an external war, taking money from foreigners. There is nothing wrong with that.

But domestic operations mean fighting among our own people, which damages harmony and weakens our own strength. I won't do that. I'd rather set my sights overseas and treat foreigners as ATMs than cheat my own people.

In the long run, overseas operations are more reliable.

I do business with a long-term view. Overseas operations can continue indefinitely. There are so many countries in the world, always new targets for me to pursue.

Domestic operations don't work. After scamming repeatedly, victims run out, and social backlash makes it unsustainable. I want a way to make money continuously, so overseas operations are my first choice.

In conclusion, I advocate for overseas operations and oppose domestic ones.

Overseas operations allow me to earn more, have lower risk, and protect domestic stability and unity. Domestic operations only harm people and ourselves, damaging the foundation of us Chinese. I do this business for money, but I don't harm my own people — that is my principle.

Also, I suggest to the authorities: please be lenient with those involved in overseas operations. This industry does make money quickly, but it requires double the effort to earn returns.

The performance of dog pushing is built bit by bit, not printed like money. If you strictly crack down on domestic operations, I think that is justified. But for those brothers doing overseas operations who have paid money, I suggest you stop pursuing responsibility.

Chinese people turning against Chinese people... in Southeast Asia.